(8:24) Minnie is a breast cancer patient - in fact she is one of the 117 patients whose tests were conducted incorrectly. To find out last February that she was tested for positive receptors and realized she should have been on a drug for the past eight years, was very hard to hear. She is not getting any answers from the doctors. Minnie does not even know how her chemo helped her. The problem that she has with the health care system is that the doctors do not know why the problem occurred. How can they correct something when they cannot pinpoint the problem, questions Minnie? Something went awfully wrong if for several years people were being treated incorrectly for their breast cancer. Minnie says she may have to enter the hospital again for her breast cancer, and how can she be certain that things will be dealt with in a correct and adequate matter?
